The 80s

Growing up, B.A.M. was taught and heavily influenced by his father Tommie Sessoms Sr., who, he admits proudly in the liner notes of his most recent mix tape. B.A.M will dedicate all of his musical pursuits to his dad who passed away shortly after the release of B.A.M first mix tape in 2001.

At age 5, he listen artist like Run DMC. B.A.M'S entire family is musically gifted. He has younger brother who is also and inspired hip hop artist and a sister who has R&B voice from heaven. B.A.M would listen and master their sounds. He found that learning their songs came very naturally as his father had equipped him with the tools he needed to tackle just about any style of music. Much of the earliest techniques and songwriting, stage present fundamentals B.A.M learned from his father can still be heard in his music to this day.

"Probably more important in my music is the selection of beats from my producers" B.A.M emphasizes, "My father taught me the fundamentals of what it meant to be a great musician. He was an exceedingly intellectual man and he drove home his philosophy that becoming a great rhythm was an essential part of being a great hip hop artist and that the importance of learning to be a good support player as part of an ensemble was paramount in my pursuit of becoming a great musician."

His father's support and wisdom are the basis for much of B.A.M.'S Success "He always told me 'B.A.M, never be afraid to get on stage with anyone. Don't ever be intimidated. You can hang with anybody out there.' He was always saying things like that." he remembers. "One afternoon he was listening to me freestyle in the next room. I don't remember what I was rapping about, but it was probably loud and wild. After a minute he came in and said matter-of-factly, 'B.A.M, you are going to be one of the best hip hop artist on the planet someday.' It was a very powerful thing to say not because I think I am one of the best or that I think I will be one of the best but because when he said it I knew I didn't have to be it, I just had to believe it."

B.A.M says the guidance and support of his father combined with the unconditional support of his mother, brother, sister, and Best Friend Mr. Dante T. Thompson (Worldnet Entertainment President & CEO) has been the key. "My mother has to be the hippest and most enlightened, intelligent and tolerant person I know. My mother endured some of the loudest music known to man, and my late-night tests of new speakers with maximum volume. She has always supported and encouraged my music and is always the voice of reason when things go topsy-turvy on me in my music business endeavors. I could not have survived the challenging life of a music artist without her support and counsel. I can honestly say that everything I know and everything I've become I owe to being blessed with great parents."

Offstage

While he focuses much of his time on his musical pursuits, B.A.M has vastly varying talents and interests. He is an accomplished songwriter and hip hop artist, and a devoted father to his 2 sons Anthony and Brandon.
